SCOPE AND CONTENT NOTE

The Papers of William E. Robinson span the years from 1932 to 1969. During this period, Robinson held positions as a newspaper executive with the New York Evening Journal (1933-36) and the New York Herald Tribune (1936-54), directed his own public relations firm of Robinson-Hannegan Associates (1954-55), and served as president and chairman of the board of Coca-Cola, Inc. (1955-61). In addition to having a long and distinguished career in business, Robinson also enjoyed a long and close personal friendship with Dwight D. Eisenhower, dating from their first meeting in World War II until their deaths in 1969. Robinson's papers reflect both his business career and, especially, his association with Eisenhower.

Robinson first met General Eisenhower in 1944 when the former was in Europe to reestablish publication of the Herald Tribune's European edition. Their association became more intimate in 1947 when Robinson prevailed upon the General to write his World War II memoirs. According to arrangements worked out by Robinson, Eisenhower's Crusade in Europe came out in the fall of 1948, published in book form by Doubleday and syndicated to newspapers worldwide by the Herald Tribune.

The two men were drawn together by a great admiration and respect for each other's ideas and judgments, and an abiding common passion for playing bridge and golf. It was Robinson, in the spring of 1948 after the General had finished drafting his memoirs, who first introduced the Eisenhowers to Augusta National Golf Club. When Eisenhower became president of Columbia University in New York City, the two had frequent occasions to play bridge together and to enjoy a game of golf at Blind Brook Golf Club where Robinson sponsored Eisenhower as a member.

According to Robinson, his main goal in life at this time was to do everything in his power to get Eisenhower nominated and elected as president of the United States. In 1948 he encouraged Helen Rogers Reid, the owner of the Herald Tribune, to have the newspaper editorially support Eisenhower for president.. He increased his activities on Eisenhower's behalf in 1950, 1951, and early 1952, corresponding with influential individuals who shared his goal, and actively counseling with the General on the presidency. Eisenhower in turn would often write long letters to Robinson in order to assist himself in organizing his thoughts on important issues. Robinson worked tirelessly behind the scenes to help organize groups to support Eisenhower's nomination for president by the Republican party, and took part in making many of the most important and crucial decisions affecting the successful nomination campaign. During the election campaign he maintained close contact with the candidate, contributing speech draft information and making suggestions where he felt there was a need for improvement in the campaign. After the election on November 4, Robinson shared in Eisenhower's victory by accompanying him to Georgia for a period of welcome relaxation at the bridge table and on the golf course of Augusta National Golf Club.

Robinson's intimate association with President Eisenhower continued during his two terms in office. Press accounts which describe how the president relaxed always named Robinson as one of Eisenhower's closest personal friends in whose company he could temporarily find relief from the constant pressures and burdens of the presidency. They spent numerous weekends and holidays together, with bridge and golf the main entertainment. Eisenhower appreciated having a good friend who did not seek personal or political gain from being close to the president of the United States, and he greatly valued Robinson's impressions and opinions on matters of personal and public interest. In addition to providing relaxation for the president and contributing advice to him on various subjects, Robinson often expressed his friendship in other actions also. For example, in 1956 he purchased Eisenhower's World War II staff car for exhibit at the Eisenhower Museum in Abilene, Kansas, and in 1958 he helped to stimulate editorial support for the administration's plan to reorganize the Department of Defense.

In the years after Eisenhower left the White House, Robinson and the former president maintained their close personal friendship. Robinson occasionally provided Eisenhower with drafts for proposed speeches, and the two men exchanged long and candid letters on politics and economics. He also was one of a select group brought together regularly by Milton Eisenhower for seminar sessions with the former president in order to keep him informed about current issues. In their retirement years, bridge and golf also remained a strong bond between the two men. Especially characteristic of these last years before Eisenhower and Robinson died in 1969 are the many exchanges of warm compliments and sentiments of affection in their correspondence. An acquaintanceship that began in World War II, which grew into a close friendship during Robinson's arrangement for the publication of Crusade in Europe, and then served as a source of relaxation and quiet support while Eisenhower was president, was to remain a treasured source of enjoyment, pleasure, and pride for both men to the end.

Of the seven series within the Robinson papers, the first two are the most significant in documenting Robinson's relationship with Dwight D. Eisenhower. Series I is a correspondence file, arranged chronologically from 1944 to 1969, of material related to Eisenhower. Among the correspondence, memoranda, diary notes, clippings, and other documents are numerous exchanges of letters between Robinson and Eisenhower, including several long, introspective communications from Eisenhower when he was president. The division of materials into "Personal" and "General" folders from 1944 to 1953 describes the nature of the items within the folders in only a broad sense, and often there are copies of the same document in both folders covering a particular time span. From 1954 to 1969 Robinson combined the two categories. Series II is an alphabetically arranged subject file of material related to Eisenhower for the period 1944-69. In addition to the types of documents found in the chronological series, the subject file also contains a large number of diary notes, speech drafts, publications, and newspaper clippings. Folder titles for this subject series include the names of individuals, events, publications, and general topics. Although in some cases there are copies of a specific document in both the chronological and the subject series, the two series are not generally duplicates of the same material.

Major themes in both these series are the publication of Crusade in Europe, Eisenhower's campaign for the Republican presidential nomination in 1952, and politics in general. The materials on Crusade in Europe, including correspondence, memoranda, and notes, describe Robinson's negotiations with Eisenhower and several book publishers in 1947 which culminated the next year in Doubleday's publication of Eisenhower's full manuscript and the Herald Tribune's syndication to newspapers of selected portions. The materials on Eisenhower's nomination campaign are extensive, varied, and sometimes unique. A few items relate to the possibility of Eisenhower's candidacy in 1948, but the great majority of items cover the period 1950-52 when Robinson was particularly active on Eisenhower's behalf. Robinson's correspondence, memoranda, diary notes, and later reminiscences document his important roles in Eisenhower's announcement as a Republican, the timing of Eisenhower's return to the United States for his NATO assignment to announce officially his candidacy for the Republican presidential nomination, and the struggles over organization and strategy within the group of people working to secure Eisenhower's nomination. His comments on the individuals who participated in organizing the nomination campaign are often revealingly candid. Because Robinson had such a strong interest in politics, his papers contain material on various aspects of national and New York state politics from 1948 until 1968. This includes information not only on the nomination campaign of 1952, but also to a lesser extent on all the presidential elections from 1948 through 1968.

The subject series is the larger of the two series, and contains more diverse subject matter and forms of documentation. The 1952 nomination campaign is covered in extensive detail by documents in a great variety of folders. Items related to general themes of economic policy, the cold war, public relations, labor versus management conflicts, and the nature of political parties are also scattered throughout both this series and the chronological series. Specific folders detail Robinson's purchase of Eisenhower's World War II staff car, Eisenhower's views regarding various columnists, and Robinson-Eisenhower exchanges on taxes and the economy. Both series contain much correspondence in addition to the Robinson-Eisenhower communications, correspondence which either was with or related to such individuals as Milton Eisenhower, Mamie Eisenhower, Helen Rogers Reid, Edward Bermingham, Douglas Black, and Sigurd Larmon. Among the special name folders within the subject series, those for Alfred Gruenther and Richard Nixon are the most complete. Robinson's exchanges of letters with Gruenther are almost exclusively personal and are dominated by bridge banter; the Nixon material is a combination of personal and political correspondence.

Of special interest in the subject series are the folders which contain Robinson's diary comments and his notes compiled for possible publication of a book. The diary notes are short entries kept by Robinson regarding some of his experiences with Dwight D. Eisenhower. They range from Eisenhower's impressions of his first full tour of the White House and his handling of a stag dinner at the executive mansion, to background information on Eisenhower's first inaugural prayer and the choice of Nixon's vice presidential running mate in 1960. These folders also contain several long memoranda to Eisenhower, written by Robinson in the 1960s at his request, in which Robinson reminisced about the publication of Crusade in Europe and the 1952 presidential nomination campaign.

A common thread that runs through these first two series and the entire collection is the Robinson-Eisenhower friendship, and their mutual pleasure in the games of golf and bridge. Robinson emphasized in several documents that Eisenhower used golf not only as a means for physical exercise, but also, through an ability to concentrate completely on the game, as a form of mental relaxation. In a similar manner, bridge also served as a means of mental relaxation. Robinson most frequently paired with George E. Allen to provide opposition for President Eisenhower and his customary partner General Alfred Gruenther.

There are two short series which cover Robinson's business and personal activities. Series IV, the smaller of the two, is a subject series. Correspondence, memoranda, and printed items document Robinson's "Business Management" editorials published in 1943 in the Herald Tribune. The editorials, meant to defend New York City's position of leadership in the financial and business world, were published in booklet form under the title "New York Marches On." The series also contains several long letters by Robinson describing his work with the New York Graphic 1928-30, and an extensive number of condolence cards and letters at the time of Robinson's death in 1969, including items from many prominent people who had known and worked with him. Series V is a speech series containing drafts, reading copies, and printed texts of many of Robinson's speeches from 1932 to 1960. The early speeches relate to his career in the newspaper business. They usually deal with sales and advertising topics, although several items document his impressions from his trips to Europe and Paris in late 1944 and 1945. The later speeches were made when Robinson was associated with Coca-Cola, Inc., and describe in detail the history of the company, the economics of the soft drink industry, and the importance of advertising to sales of the product. In the course of these speeches, Robinson would occasionally refer to President Eisenhower when citing an example or using an anecdote to make a particular point.

The final three series within the Robinson papers deal with a variety of subjects. Robinson was in charge of fund raising in the state of New York for the Eisenhower Library Commission, established in part to solicit donations for the Eisenhower Presidential Library in Abilene, Kansas. While some financial records regarding Robinson's activities for the Commission can be found in other parts of the collection, Series III consists of index cards with the names of all contributors from New York and the amount of their contributions. Series VI contains Robinson's daily appointment books for 1946-61. The books are office diaries usually maintained by Robinson's secretary, Ruth Kraus Ellis, and contain notations on his appointments schedules, telephone calls, trips, daily expense account figures, and gifts. The diaries, useful for documenting the amount of time Robinson spent with Eisenhower in these years, also have a few scattered, cryptic comments and anecdotes on events of the period. Four scrapbooks for the years 1933-60, and a number of obituaries about Robinson's death in 1969, make up Series VII. The correspondence, memoranda, speech texts, photographs, clippings and memorabilia fastened onto the scrapbook pages cover Robinson's business career and his friendship with Eisenhower. Among the items in the scrapbooks are several original letters from Eisenhower to Robinson in the 1940s (copies in Series I and/or II), a number of photographs that include candid pictures of Eisenhower from the late 1940s, articles which describe President Eisenhower's closest friends, and clippings that mentioned Robinson's activities with the president.

Several comments are pertinent to the general arrangement, description, and disposition of the collection. Robinson's original letters to Dwight D. Eisenhower can usually be found in Eisenhower's Papers, 1916-52, in the Name Series of Eisenhower's Papers as President of the United States, 1953-61, or in the Special Name Series of Eisenhower's Personal Papers, Post-Presidential, 1961-69. Scattered throughout the collection are a small number of electrostatic reproductions (Xerox copies) of documents. Some of these reproductions are stamped to indicate that they replaced deteriorating manuscript items; reproductions which do not bear such a marking were among the papers at the time of their deposit in the Eisenhower Library. In most cases, electrostatic reproductions were also substituted for original photographs which were removed and transferred to the Dwight D. Eisenhower Library Audiovisual collection. General arrangement of the collection has been provided by the processing archivist. Within each series and individual folders, the specific ordering of items is usually alphabetical and/or chronological, whichever is appropriate. Actual folder titles conform closely where possible to those on the files at the time of deposit, although documents often had to be refiled in order for their placement to be consistent with the folder titles. Some of the more significant subjects documented by materials in various folders have been noted within brackets [] after the folder titles on the container list. However, such comments are meant to show highlights of the information within the folder, and are not meant necessarily to describe all of the subjects documented by materials in the folder.
