SCOPE AND CONTENT NOTE

The records of the President’s Committee to Study the United States Military Assistance Program (MAP) span the years 1958-1959 and consist of minutes, reports, correspondence, studies, and other materials relevant to the Committee’s operation.

The bipartisan Committee was created in November 1958 when President Eisenhower appointed a group of “eminent Americans” to “undertake a completely independent, objective, and nonpartisan analysis of the military assistance aspects of the U.S. Mutual Security Program (MSP).” To serve as chairman, the President selected William H. Draper, Jr.

The Draper Committee began work for its analysis of the eight-year-old MSP from the basic premise that the threat (political, economic, military, and subversive) to the free world by communist dictatorships was “greater than ever.” In meeting this multiple threat “posed by the activities of international communism” it was necessary that the U.S. utilize as needed both economic and military assistance. A statement, drawn up by military authorities and entitled “Minimum Essential Force Requirements, 1958-1963” (better known as MC-70) represented the minimum forces essential to carry out this basic U.S. strategic concept. The Committee established as high priorities to U.S. Security the assistance to less developed countries which were “under the gun” of communism and the modernization of free world military forces, particularly the NATO area. The Committee further contended that it was necessary to “bring clearly” before the American people the relationship between MSP’s building of a collective security and the national interest.

The aspects probably given most attention by the Committee in its analysis were the organization, planning, administration and funding of MAP. From the beginning, the program had operated on the basis of one-year Congressional appropriations and authorization. The Eisenhower Administration sought permanent authorization with the military assistance appropriations transferred from the Mutual Security Appropriations bill to the regular Department of Defense Appropriations bill. After conducting its study, the Draper committee agreed with the administration by stressing the need for continuity with planning and programming based on a long-term approach (the Committee suggested three to five years) allowing administration of military assistance to be conducted with greater speed and flexibility. The containing authorization for appropriations could be placed in the Defense budget by Congressional revision of the Mutual Security Act.

The responsibility for the administration of MAP was seen by the Committee as being somewhat jumbled between the state and Defense departments. To clarify the responsibility, it was recommended that the role of State on the policy level be strengthened, thus assuring a conformity of MAP to foreign policy. This was to be achieved by making revisions to Section 4000 of the MAP Guidance which provided guidelines and criteria ensuring that MAP served to support the totality of U.S. foreign policy objectives in each region and country. To Defense would go the responsibility for planning, programming, and execution of military assistance within the framework of policy guidance laid down by the National Security Council and State. Within Defense the creation of a Director of Military Assistance and an independent evaluation staff was suggested with MAP planning decentralized to U.S. Unified Commands overseas and the Military Assistance Advisory Groups (MAAG). As a check on all MAP, the Committee further recommended that a continuing critical program review be maintained within the Executive Branch.

Another aspect of mutual security of special interest to the Draper Committee was that of relative emphasis, or the balance between military assistance and economic assistance. The Committee recognized the latter, including the effect of P.L. 480 operations, as an important foreign policy tool. The analysis of U.S. economic assistance programs concluded that the administration of such programs was not coordinated under the State Department. Therefore, the creation of a single agency with its own personnel system to provide coordination, possibly best done by decentralizing responsibilities to Ambassadors and Economic Mission Chiefs around the world, was suggested. It was further recommended that the U.S. continue authorization and long-range funding for the Development Loan Fund (DLF) and other technical assistance programs and utilize more effectively available surplus agricultural commodities in support of MSP objectives. It was also suggested by the Committee that private enterprise be stimulated to participate in foreign development.

The Draper Committee was organized into various task forces and area study teams. The teams visited countries receiving military assistance and then submitted reports concerning the political, military, agricultural, economic, and foreign trade situation for that area which were used to formulate recommendations for the program. The Committee also solicited suggestions and recommendations from a wide variety of military leaders, including MAAG chiefs and U.S. commanders of theaters around the world, and governmental heads. Committee members were regularly briefed by officials from State, Defense, Agriculture, Navy, Army, Joint Chiefs of Staff, NSC, and others. During its rather short existence, the Draper Committee accumulated a massive body of materials on the MSP, including both classified and unclassified documents.

The Committee produced four reports during its lifetime, three interim reports—“Preliminary Conclusions” (March 17, 1959), “The Organization and Administration of Military Assistance Program” (June 3, 1959), and “Economic Assistance Program and Administration” (July 13, 1959) -- and a final report dated August 17, 1959. All of these represented the “unanimous conclusions” of the Committee and were submitted to the President who approved and sent them on the Congress. Materials in the collection include minutes of Committee meetings; reports, briefings, correspondence, guidelines, and information papers received by the Committee from various governmental agencies and leaders to assist in the Committee’s analysis; and Committee task force and area team reports, drafts, preliminary conclusions and other materials produced by the Committee in preparation of its final report. Subject matter can be categorized as military assistance, economic assistance, relative emphasis, the impact of science and technology, and Committee organization and operation.

The records of the Draper Committee were arranged and folderized in 27 archives boxes when they were received. This original arrangement, including folder titles, has not been altered; however, the amount of material per box has been changed for preservation purposes. There are now a total of 28 archives boxes and one index box. Due to this redistribution, the box numbers referred to throughout the index cards are no longer correct and the researcher will need to work from the current shelf list to locate the new box number for a particular item. No materials were removed from the records for the audiovisual or book collection.
